

Help Children Learn to Respect Others

Respect for others is one of the most important things children can learn from a parent. Respect is the basis for most other desirable behaviors.

Many leaders think that teaching children The Golden Rule, to “Do unto others as you would have them do unto you,” is the most important thing parents can do. It shows children how to live and work well with others.

Show your children examples of respect by using the Golden Rule as you discipline them. You wouldn’t want to be ridiculed in front of your friends—and your children don’t either.

The Golden Rule comes most naturally to children when we teach them to think about another person’s feelings. Have your child imagine how others feel in various situations.

Day-to-day living and working with others is when children learn most about respect.

Copyright © 2003 The Parent Institute, a division of NIS, Inc. - www.parent-institute.com - Reprinted with permission.

THE PARENT
INSTITUTE

Help Children Learn to Respect Others

Respect for others is one of the most important things children can learn from a parent. Respect is the basis for most other desirable behaviors.

Many leaders think that teaching children The Golden Rule, to “Do unto others as you would have them do unto you,” is the most important thing parents can do. It shows children how to live and work well with others.

Show your children examples of respect by using the Golden Rule as you discipline them. You wouldn’t want to be ridiculed in front of your friends—and your children don’t either.

The Golden Rule comes most naturally to children when we teach them to think about another person’s feelings. Have your child imagine how others feel in various situations.

Day-to-day living and working with others is when children learn most about respect.

Copyright © 2003 The Parent Institute, a division of NIS, Inc. - www.parent-institute.com - Reprinted with permission.

THE PARENT
INSTITUTE